His form is hideous. With forehead disfigured by offensive knots; his head repulsive by protruding, stunted horns; his cheeks partly enveloped by huge ears that threaten his shoulders; his short tail protruding from the middle of his body; his feet hoof-covered and cloven, and his hairy goat limbs swelling with great muscles. the Satyr presents a form ugly and repellant. He is a beast. He prowls the woods and seeks by force to destroy the purity of the woodland nymphs. He is a debauchee from his fondness for wine, yet shows the touch of the moiety of manhood in him by loving music and by his dexterity in the use of the flute and bagpipe. The Satyr is a terror to men. Under pretence of friendship, he attacks man, fills him with fright, and drives him to flight by his hideousness and his ferocity. Sometimes dwelling in the hills, and again in the vales, he exhibits the restless spirit of the wicked who find no rest in the upright occupations of life. He has no settled place of habitation. His business is to go about seeking whom he may devour, and to inflict mischief and injury on the innocent. Brother to the Cureties, his idle and worthless kinsmen, the Satyr shows his relationship to them in the similarity of their mutual vices....
