When she first hears footsteps in the attic, she dismisses it as the groans and creaks of a new home. When she sees things moving across her living room without reason, she dismisses it as a figment of her overactive imagination. Finally, when she runs out of excuses, Emmy finally accepts that her house isnt just old, its actually being possessed by a thousand year-old demon named Malkos. Malkos is not a happy demon. He doesnt like his job. Hes supposed to torment, haunt and kill human victims but hes bored. Hes used to being able to walk through an attic and have his prey scream with terror and call in an exorcist. He hadnt banked on Emmy. She doesnt scream. . . she rationalizes. She accepts that shes being haunted but she doesnt give in to it. Malkos has finally met his match: A human who is as bored with life as he is. Though they come from different worlds, Emmy and Malkos soon discover that they really arent that different after all. In the end they learn that while misery loves company, romance isnt bad either and though it means inevitable misery for one or both, they realize that sometimes its worth exploring new worlds to find their place in their own.
