Excerpt from Cornell University Official Publication, Vol. 10: The Report of the Conference at the New York State Veterinary College During the Semi-Centennial Celebration of Cornell University, June, 1919 I have also dealt with anthrax in grazing cattle, by sterilized serum from the infected. Others have failed with dairy cows. Perhaps the effect of milk and milking on the system robs the serum of its value. So with blackleg. These illustrate how different plagues require different fundamental treatment. The whole great field of parasites demands for each its own special treatment. In 1879 the New York legislature made an appropriation to stamp out lung plague, but after a year s work, with a successful end well in sight, a change in party rule rendered it impossible to do more. In 1887 the plague, as I had pre dicted, appeared in the Chicago Stock Yards. The lesson had now been learned. The Federal government supplied the means and Illinois the authority, and in three months I saw the last acute case of the disease destroyed. This was followed by equally vigorous work in the...
